

The experiences during the Corona pandemic have made it clear that the relationship between sciences, life-worlds as well as social and political realities is uncertain and ambivalent. Current phenomena such as the increasing digitalization and algorithmicization of the life-world, its increasing scientification and the simultaneous "post-factual" relativization of scientific knowledge as well as the globalization and medialization of interpersonal relationships, can be described as a crisis of reality or realities. Rather, the question of how to convey ways of accessing reality and truth once again seems to be the center of pedagogical aspirations.

The questions as to what is real, what is given, what is evident and what is true are among the key problems of phenomenology or rather of the phenomenon (the question of what shows itself or how it shows itself to us). Those questions of the constitution of reality are closely connected to the concept of experience, field-theoretically connected to the concept of life-world and methodologically connected to the method of reduction and also include a critique of instrumental scientism, leading to a rehabilitation of life-world doxic, lived-bodily, and pre-predicative experiences.

This is also applying to phenomenological pedagogy, which is theoretically, methodologically, and practically concerned with the constitution of realities within the experiences of learning, Bildung, and education as well as with the subjects and materialities, and their media in pedagogical institutions.

Phenomenological approaches try to explore the ways of experiencing life-worldly, medial, digital, and social experiences in a qualitatively meaningful, empirical, and experience-oriented way and thus to offer alternatives to positivistic, scientific, idealistic, or psychologicistic approaches.
